EXPERIMENTAL SITE BIODIVERSITY AND VARIETAL INNOVATION IN OLIVE GROWING

Aimed in creating the first national programme of genetic improvement of olive trees resistant to Xylella.

Save the Olives is facing its most important challenge to date aiming to provide a concrete outlet to years of hard work: the creation of an experimental site for biodiversity and varietal innovation in olive growing.

10 years after the discovery of the Xylella epidemic in Apulia, it has now become clear that solutions to combat the epidemic must pass through the development of genetic improvement programmes. In order to do so, long-term availability of adequate facilities is required such as greenhouses, laboratories, all existing and working, and an experimental fields, which is now Savetheolives objective.

We would set up an experimental olive grove allowing us to compare and evaluate the characteristics of thousands of plants in order to select those with the best characteristics of oil production and resistance to both the disease and to climate change.

This will be an experimental site serving as a repository of olive biodiversity. The genetic diversity that originates from plant-crossing activities is an important source not only for resistance to the Xylella bacteria but for countless other characteristics inherent to an olive tree: from its habitus, to the specific organoleptic qualities of the oil produced.

It is estimated that an area of 5-10 hectares with water supply will be required in order to complete this project. Having such an experimental site available is a medium to long term intervention which would benefit the entire agricultural community of Apulia and also all Mediterranean countries.

Please consider supporting us in our vision. It's time to donate!
